

This is a list of available services in the community. PediPRN does not provide recommendation or endorsement but provides this directory for your convenience. There are other community resources beyond this list. No recommendations are expressed or implied regarding the quality of the services provided by the resources on this directory.

Neuropsychological Assessment: This involves specific expertise of a neuropsychologist, and often involves completing a battery of tests which can take anywhere from a few hours to a few days of assessment. It is sometimes required for obtaining services for autism, and can be helpful for diagnosing ADHD, learning disabilities, and executive functioning difficulties. Neuropsychological assessment is also useful for monitoring changes associated with chronic and acute medical conditions that impact cognitive functioning (e.g., glioblastoma, TBI). Justification of need for this level of assessment is often required for it to be covered by insurance.

Psychological Assessment:

Some practices offer psychological assessment in addition to and/or in the context of neuropsychological assessment. Some offer psychological assessment as part of other psychotherapy services. The providers are clinical psychologists with doctoral degrees and have further training in clinical interviewing, differentiating between diagnoses, and treatment planning. These services are useful for further assessment and diagnostic clarity on presenting personality/emotional symptoms. Given the symptom overlap of some diagnoses, in-depth neuropsychological assessments may be optimal. In this case, practitioners may recommend further testing after a psychological assessment is completed. It is important to note that practitioners have varying levels of expertise and competency, so some practices offer targeted assessments for specific diagnoses (e.g., ADHD, OCD) based on practitioner expertise.

Educational Assessment:

This includes targeted tests (which are commonly included within a neuropsychological assessment battery) with a focus on educational functioning (e.g., intelligence, academic performance, processing skills). Neuropsychologists and clinical psychologists are trained to conduct these, but providers with specific school psychology training have additional expertise. Educational assessments are often completed by special education service providers within the child's school district; however, families sometimes desire to seek out an assessment independent from their child's school and seek out a community provider to complete this type of assessment. These assessments are not always covered by insurance.

When evaluating community resources, it can be helpful to consider the following: active licensure, education and training alignment with services provided, and service alignment with evidence-based practices.
